Abstract:
The US temporary employment industry is currently the subject of intense criticism. Rising use of temporary employees, which is part of the larger trend of contingency employment, is being blamed for countless workforce reductions that occur across several industries. Temporary employment is also seen as a way out for employers from providing their workers with the usual benefits that are granted to regular and full-time employees. Critics claim the temporary employment results in the economic and psychological incapacitation of workers. Temp workers often face discrimination and fail to secure promised permanent jobs.

It was the first time the economy lost jobs in a month since September 2010, and the worst month for American jobs since the depths of the Great Recession in March 2009. The unemployment rate shot up to 4.4%, from a near 50-year low of 3.5%. It was the highest unemployment rate since August 2017 and the largest single-month change in the jobless rate since January 1975. Most of the job destruction took place at restaurants and bars, where the economy lost 417,400 jobs. If there's an ounce of good news in the March report, it's that bulk of the layoffs were temporary: 1.8 million people were unemployed temporarily last month, up from 1 million in February.
