Abstract
This is a children’s book told from the perspective of a little girl who wants to be a teacher someday. She has a teacher who is highly invested in helping her students succeed and teaches them this lesson with a little gardening project. Children are like blossoms, they just need the right conditions to flourish. This book is the combination of my creative thought and a professor who encouraged me to see the world from a student’s point of view. As a future educator, this is a snapshot of what I hope to inspire in my students; that no matter what your circumstances are, you can be whatever you wish and I will help you get there.

This is a wonderful children's book that addresses the age old question, "What do you want to be when you grow up?" The rhyming is wonderful. The artwork is consistent with the story. This is a delightful little book apparently written by a 15 year old based on her musings as a child on what she wanted to be when she grew up. The rhyming texts was very easy to read and the pictures are well done. This book could become a favourite for young children who have recently learned to read, with some help from their parents.
